Proving something for general case covers all of the special cases that are included in the general case. Proving a special case only indicates that the general case might be true. For instance, the proof I submitted to Q2.1 only covers discrete cases, for continuous cases it would require additional proving that integral of the inverse transform still exists.